Understanding Cap Rates in Multifamily Real Estate

Property values can move even when the building itself hasn't changed. Capitalization rates, or cap rates, help explain why. Widely used across income-producing real estate, they help investors compare properties and understand the relationship between a property's Net Operating Income (NOI) and market value.

What Is a Cap Rate?

Cap rates provide a simplified way to compare properties even if they differ considerably in location, size, age, condition, and other characteristics. A popular formula is:

$$\text{Forward-Looking 1-Year NOI} \div \text{Property Value} = \text{Cap Rate}$$

For example, a property valued at $1 million and expected to generate $50,000 in annual NOI would have a cap rate of 5%. Depending on the purpose of the analysis, cap rates may also be calculated using trailing, current, or projected NOI values.

How Do Cap Rates Relate to Value?

Cap rates generally have an inverse relationship with property values. All else being equal, higher cap rates correspond with lower property values, while lower cap rates correspond with higher property values.

At a given cap rate, changes in NOI can also help illustrate changes in property value. For example, assuming a cap rate of 5% remains unchanged, each additional dollar of annual NOI would correspond with $20 of additional property value. This helps connect improvements in a property's operating performance with its potential valuation.

What Can't Cap Rates Tell You?

Cap rates are useful, but they do not represent an investor's actual return or a property's overall profitability, which can also be affected by financing, property improvements, local market conditions, and other factors. It is also important to remember that cap rates do not independently cause property values to rise or fall. Ultimately, market value is driven by supply and demand.

For investors, cap rates are therefore best understood as one useful tool for evaluating and comparing income-producing real estate, rather than a complete measure of an investment's performance.
