Now is the Perfect Time to Invest in the Right Type of Real Estate

Over the three months ending June 2022, single-family house prices have dropped by 7.7%. This has caused concerns amongst real estate investors wondering if now is the time to avoid investing in real estate.

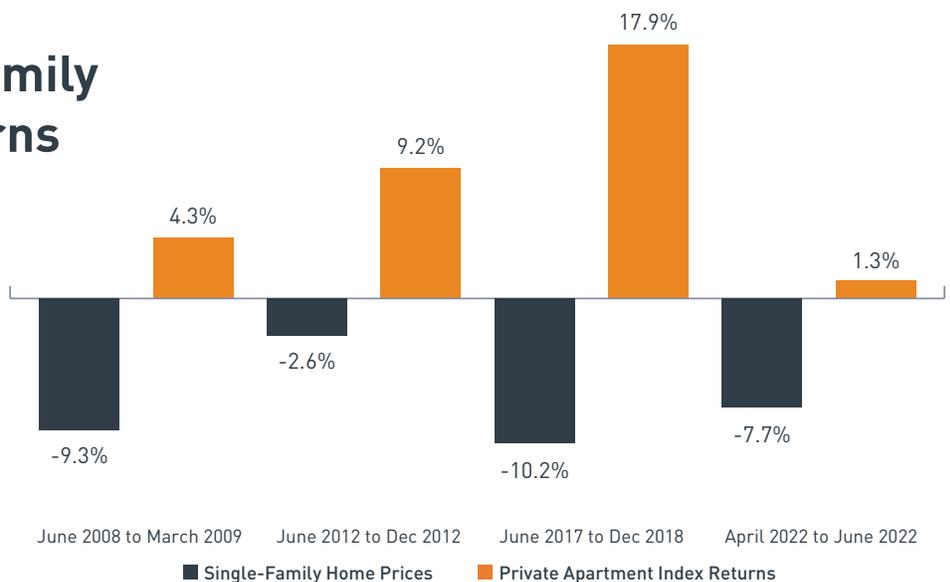

The chart below shows that not all residential-related real estate is created equal and looks at periods when single-family home prices decreased and compares that to the returns of Private Canadian Apartments.

Decrease in Single-Family Home Prices vs. Returns on Private Canadian Apartments

History shows that a downturn or correction in single-family homes has no bearing on or correlation to the performance of multi-residential apartments.

MULTI-FAMILY REAL ESTATE REMAINS STRONG

Multi-family apartments represent an essential sector and fulfill the most basic of human need of finding a place to live. Multi-family apartments are attractive to investors because of the built-in, perpetual demand for housing. Further, annual rent increases provide an excellent hedge against inflation. This type of investment is attractive in markets that are supply constrained and are seeing immigrational and migrational population growth due to strength in the underlying regional economy.

Here are some other trends that should impact multi-family apartments positively:

Would-be homebuyers are being sidelined partly by tighter lending policies and rising interest rates. Such changes have made it harder for first-time buyers to purchase a new home. Several purchasers have either been entirely sidelined or looked at more affordable options, like renting.

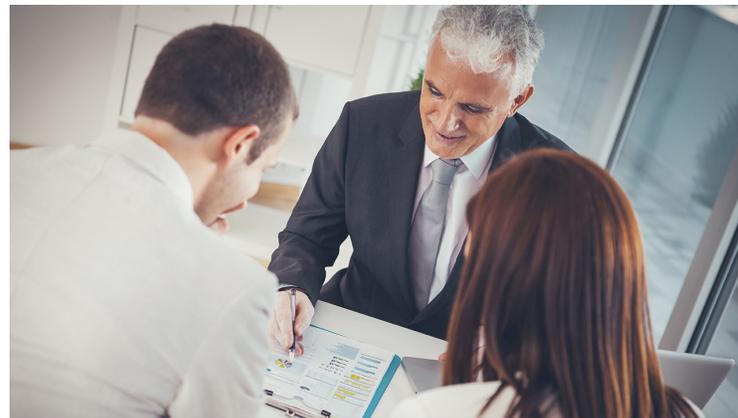

Vacancy rates are extremely low. Anticipated future demand for housing is expected to continue to outweigh the supply, given land scarcity and increases in population and immigration, keeping vacancy rates low for the foreseeable future.

Rental prices are increasing. Numerous municipalities are experiencing increasing rent due to the low vacancy rate and heightened rental competition in the market.
